Even our common red brick houses are better than the vulgar ash-grey, Jerusalem artichoke colored edifices, they lavished expressions of tenderness, they protested that they could not and would not staringly alike, and equally uninteresting, that are growing up in long line and regular square be separated from her; and Janet foresaw that a welding tour encumbered with the Labarte girls would be worse than none at all, or one in Imperial Aix, in patrician Nurnberg, in episcopal Spires, everywhere treading on and trampling out beauty. In a hundred years probably all the great towns of the Middle Ages will have with the Labarte girls plus Mrs. Sidebottom, and Salome and Philip to draw them off from her occasionally. As the party drove from the Embassy, Mrs. Sidebottom said to Philip: "By been transmuted from gold to lead, and be ut-terly unattractive. When we see a ruin of a the way, what do you think? On a brilliant summer day, when the sun was On a brilliant summer day, when the san was streaming down out of a perfectly blue sky into the long main street of Berne, alive with marketers, three cabs drew up at the entrance to the Hotel of the Wild Man, near the Clocktower, and from them stepped, in the first place, a young man in light grey trousers and place, a young man in light grey trousers and lavender gloves, and then a young and pretty indy wearing a bridal yeil, a wedding dress of silver grey. From the second carriage de-scended three bridesmaids—no other than the Labarte girls—and from the third cab, Mrs. sidebottom and Philip and Salome.

Captain Pennycomequick had been married at the embassy to Janet Baynes, and if the day's weather gave a true presage of the new life entered on, that of the Captain and his bride was likely to be a happy one. But there were surer grounds on which to base a forecast of their hymeneal condition than the state of the weather. The Captain was an amiable man, whom nothing would rouse to opposition, and Janet, as he and his mother had ascertained, was very comfortably off. She had or would have about 500 a year, and 500 per annum in France where they intended to live would allow of their enjoying themselves as much as if they had double that sum in England, not necessarily because things were cheaper in France, but because popular opinion allowed retrenchment in a thousand of those trifles which in England are the great outlets that let noney leak away.

There was to be no wedding tour; not because Janet did not desire to escape with the Captain from the rest of the party, but because the Labarte girls absolutely refused to be parted with. They had suddenly woke to the discovery that airs. Sidebottom had hoodwinked them, and carried them away out of sight and hearing, while love-making was in progress; a cil had been torn from before their eyes and they saw through all her dodges and subterfuges, and were in combined mutiny and augry protest. Henceforth nothing would sever them from their aunt. A great opportunity had been revelation to him—the splendor of the glacier mountain world, and simultaneously with it a realization of the beauty, the charm of that old world of the Middle Ages which is being re-morselessly and surely effaced, and on which in another century the men of that generation will be unable to look, or will know of it only a few scattered monuments, set in wastes of few scattered monuments, set in wastes of hideousness, and judge of it only as one might judge of the ocean by contemplating a few shells dugs out of a chalk bed.

The party of Pennycomequick—Sidebotton Labarte had settled itself to a marble-toppe or, to be more exact, initiation marble-topped table, and had ordered the waitress to bring the carte of wines and meats, when Claudine Labarte nudged her aunt, and whispered— "See! see! There they are, M. le Comte de to them?"

"On no account," said Mrs. Pennycome-quick, that is to say Janet, hastily. "Besides," she looked in the same direction, "they do not seem to desire our interference."

All looked at the little table, not far distant, where sat Beaple Yeo, alias Schofield, and his bride. The same day that had smiled on Lambride. The same day that had smiled on Lambert and Janet had laughed over them, but without sure augury of calm weather apparently; for already a post-nuptial storm had broken loose. Beaple Yeo was leaning back in his green-painted iron chair, very red and blotched in face, and opposite him was Artemisia whom he had just made his wife, flushed and telling sending.

and talking rapidly.

It was clear that they were in augry alterea tion—about what could not be learned—for their voices were drowned by the music from the little theater in the grounds, in which the overture to Boildieu's "Jean de Paris" was being performed.

Beaple Yeo curled his whisker round his forefinger, and said something in reply to a discharge of angry words from Artemisia; whatever it was that he said, it so stung her that, losing all self-control, she sprung to her feet, leaned across the table and struck him on the cheek. Beaple lost his equilibrium and went over with his chair on the gravel of the terrace, to the great amusement of the Swiss waitress and the scattered visitors at tables, who had noticed the altercation. Artemisia was startled at her own violence, and ashamed; she looked around and caught sight of the friends she had made at Andermatt. Her color was so heightened with passion that it could not become deeper with shame. In-stead of resuming her seat, without regarding the humiliated man who was picking himself up from the ground she came directly to the table where the party of Pennycomequick-Sidebottom was seated, and with heaving bosom and flashing eye, she stood before Philip, and said in a tone broken with excitement: "You have helped to deceive me. It was mean—it was cruel! You insulted me first of all, and then you conspired with this—this man to play me a base trick. It was unworthy of a entleman, of an Englishman."

"I beg your pardon," said Philip; "I do not understand of what you are speaking. I am quite unaware that I ever deceived you." "You told me be was a nobleman—an earl—and he is nothing of the kind." "I never said he was." "I asked you, and you answered me that he was an earl." "I did no such thing. You misunderstood me. You asked me whether he had any right to the title of Earl of Schofield, and I answered —I recall exactly my words—that he was per-fectly justified in calling himself Earle Scho-field. That is his name. Whether he has any right to call himself Beaple Yeo, and to claim to be a colonel is another matter on which I entertain grave doubts; but I have none what Schanzli, a garden or restaurant on a com-manding hill above Berne, once occupied by a fort from which it takes its name. From the terrace is seen the range of the Oberland mountains and, in the middle distance below, ever that his surname is Schofield, and that his Christian name is Earle."

Artemisia did not speak for a minute, she was very angry and ashamed. When she had in some measure recovered her self-possession, she said bitterly, "You might have been more "I refused to say much about the man. I had my reasons. Moreover, I had no idea that the matter was one of importance to you."

"I have sold myself to him. I have married him this day, and only now have discovered that I have been basely imposed upon."
"It is I—I who have been taken in," shouted Yeo, coming forward, pushing to the table, regardless of the shrinking fear that appeared to which the memory recurs with unalloyed pleasure, scenes which have been revelations of beauty or majesty to the soul, and such a

"And you are an an adventurer." laughed Artemisia. "Perhaps we have taken each other in, and we are both fools to have been so easily deceived. Who told you I was a rich American heiress?"

"The waiter at the Imperial." "The waiter at the Imperial."

"And he told me you were a rich milord."

Yeo, who was also very angry—angry and disappointed. "Il have a right to know who or

"And I," said Artemisia, "I also want to

"That, perhaps, I can tell you," said Philip, ravely. "But not in the presence of these in-dies. Mr. Schofield, or whatever you call yourself, I will trouble you to return to your table, or reseat yourself where you were. I see the waitress is in alarm lest she should lose payment for what you ordered and have con-sumed."

Beaple Yeo sulkily went back to his place. Philip, with a sigh, showed Artemisia that he desired her to follow. She obeyed. When they were beyond earshot of Mrs. Sidebottom, Salome and the rest, Philip said, standing by the little table: "Mr Schofield, I also wish to ask of you a question."

"I am ready, my dear boy, to be put through my catechism." answered Yeo, with recovered assurance "if you want the pedigree of Schofield, I have it at my fingers' ends."
"It is not the pedigree so much as the alliances of Earle Schofield that interests me," said Philip.

"Oh, the Schofields have been allied with the best blood in the land, better than your twopenny-ha'penny manufacturers."
"I must ask you to tell me whether, before you married Miss Durham at the Embassy today, you had ascertained that an alliance—not a very high one—was at an end."

thout a murmur or a thought of resi to it. In the course of years she would have become almost as ordinary, as petty-minded as the deceased Mrs. Cusworth. But contact with Miss Durham had startled her out of this intellectual donkeydom. She saw in the American girl a vivacity of interest, a breadth of view, a sparkle of intelligence, a receptivity for novel ideas, and a knowledge of the world and of the things in the world—the currents that circulated in it, the forces that propelled its waves and directed its tides, to which she had been completely strange. And the stimulated in completely strange. And this stimulated in her the desire to know. An American gentle-man once said to the writer, "We have no man once said to the writer, "We have no prejudices, therefore we are always learning." That is the secret of American success in every branch of activity. Self-conceit breeds pigheadedness, which raises mountains of prejudice in our way, preventing us from seeing, as the Germans have it, that there are men beyond these mountains. Salome had noticed that Miss Durham was able at once, and without effort to arrest the interest and enchain that Miss Durham was able at once, and with-out effort, to arrest the interest and enchain the attention of Philip, and this she attributed to the possession of qualities in the Chicago girl which were dormant, if not non-existent, in herself. She had the shrewdness to per-ceive, and the good sense to acknowl-edge, her own ignorance and mability to take part in conversation when it turned on politics, natural history, on music, art or social ques-tions of the day. She could talk about recipes for tapioca and semolina puddings, what profor tapioca and semolina puddings, what pro-portion of water should be put with milk for a baby, the delinquencies of servants, the ser-mons she heard, the hymns she sang in church, the cutting out and style of a dress, but not on much heyond. Being humble minded she was ready to take to heart what she recognized, and she studied Miss Durham with attention, to as-certain the points in which she was accom-plished above her own acquirements.

When ale in bottle turns flat, housewives put

"You may happen to remember Anne Dewis, the coal barge woman, whom you married at Hull some 16 years ago?"
Beaple uttered a low oath.
"I have reason to know," continued Philip, "that she is alive—and you know that she is so, which is alive—and you know that she is so, as well as I do. Miss Durham, this fellow had as well as I do. Miss Durham as well as I do. Miss Durham as well as I do. Miss Durham as well as I

Jeremiah saw that Philip bad quarrelled Jeremiah saw that Philip bad quarrelled with Salome, and, without inquiring into the occasion, he understood sufficient of their several characters to see that the best possible means he could adopt for reconciling the difference was to give them a holiday together abroad—to let them travel on the continent for some time, and mutually learn much of which both were ignorant. He according wrote to Philip not to return to Mergatroyd till Christmas. He wished, so he said, himself to spend some months at the mill in recovering the threads of the business which had fallen from his fingers, and to settle thoroughly down again into the old groove of life.

This enabled Philip, who was liberally supplied with money, to visit Paris, Rome, Milan, Venice, and return to England by the Rhine. He and Salome made traveling acquaintances, ome agreeable, all instructive; they saw France staggering after its humiliation, and Germany staggering after its humiliation, and Germany ruffling in its pride of victory; they shared small adventures, and equally small jokes such as spring up on all travel, and are as poor to preserve as the flowers gathered. They saw together picture galleries, heard together operas, and together acquired a fund of experience in life in many aspects unattainable at Mergatroyd. The tour was, as Jeremiah designed, educative to both, and it broadened and deepened their mutual sympathies. It signed, educative to both, and it broadened and deepened their mutual sympathies. It did more; it bound them togethers as chums in the same school, where both read out of the same books and summed on the same slate, and wrote out the same moral sentences in their copybooks. As they learned together, they assisted each other; what escaped the eye of one was perceived by the other, and each took delight in drawing the attention of the other to what he or she observed.

They laid up together a fund of pleasant recollections to which to revert when holiday was over and work began; a shifting diorama of scenes and incidents and personages that would transform and beautify the interior of the drum when they were recalled to the obligation of treading it.

putrefaction, and that is by putting it into our stomachs in the shape of salmon at 4 shillings a pound.

We remember the case of a very short-sighted man, who had been short-sighted from infancy. He never wore glasses till he was aged about five and twenty, and then suddenly found himself lannched into a new world and able to take a lively interest in things which had been hidden from him hitherto. We are all, through life, if we do not voluntarily become like the toad-hole dwellers, being introduced into new worlds, whether by the acquisition of a picture like the Fleming, or by learning a new language, like the German, or by travel, as the Yankee. Philip and Salome had put on their glasses simultaneously, and it quickened their affection for each other to be engaged on the same effort, and to be together in the acquisition of wisdom and knowledge and experience. Besides this intellectual and moral bond they had another—certainly at the time not very intellectual, but a very fast and dear one—the little Philip, who traveled with them wherever they went, and who wound himself about both their hearts, and in doing so blended both in one. It was early in life for the child to begin his travels, but traveling did not hurt him. He throve on it. Before he said "Pa," or "Ma," he articulated the syllable "Go." As Philip the Greater said, an augury of the young man's future, as one of action.

At length Philip and Salome were home; and once again Salome flew to the arms of the dear white-haired old man, whose face had lost all its hardness and had acquired a new expression of sweetness. And Jeremiah was able to receive her loving embrace, and to hold her to his breast without shrinking, without tremor. The storm had passed and the St. Luke's summer had set in on his end of life, to be cheered not only by the presence of Salome, but also by that of Philip the Little and Salome were returned to Mergatroyd, hasband and wife stable and mergan her to his breast. The only light in the room came from the fire; the only sound its cradle.

Both were happy, and occupied with their own thoughts.

'At length Philip broke the silence and said, "It is very, very good of Uncle Jeremiah; he has taken me into full partnership, and what is more, he proposes that he should winter abroad and return in spring to allow of our then taking a holiday together."

"And what is he going to do about Mrs. Sidebottom?"

"And what is he going to do about Mrs. Sidebottom?"

"I cannot say. He is himself undecided. He says that as he laid the trap into which she fell, he must not be too hard with her. He will see her himself. He goes after the new year to France when he will visit her and make some arrangement. He says, but hardly can mean what he says, that it is a law of nature that persons pinched in circumstances and pressed for money lose their scrupies, as crabs cast their claws, and lizards drop their tails when nipped or pursued. It is a law of nature and must be allowed for."

Philip felt a shudder of protest against his side, but Salome said nothing.

All at once she started. "Oh, Philip! What is that?"

A sound issued from the cradle: She ran to it, stobped and looked at her baby. The flashes of the firelight were reflected from the ceiling on the little face.

"Hark! oh, hark, Philip. Baby is laughing—laughing aloud in his sleep. He has never done that before. It is from very joy at being home—at his own dear home again."

"What, Salome?—after Paris and Rome, the Alps, and the Rhine, poor old dirty, dingy Mergatroyd is dear?"

"To be sure it is, Philip—how can it be otherwise? And oh, Philip, how kind the people are! How pleased they all seem to see us back again. I thought—I really thought they would have shaken my hand off, and that old Fanshaw, the night watch, would have kissed me, Philip. There may be more light hearted, have shaken my hand off, and that old Fanshaw, the night watch, would have kissed me, Philip. There may be more light hearted, more picturesque, more romant:c people in other lands, but there can be nownere, not throughout the world, more true, warmhearted, sterling folk, than our dear Yorkshire people. Do you not love them, Philip?"
"I have given Yorkshire the best proof of my attachment in taking to me a wife from thence."

thence."
"Oh, Philip!"
Salome nestled to his side again by the window, and with him again looked forth silently into the night; ky.
After a long pause Philip said, "Hark!"
Through the still night air could be heard the church bell.

Three. "Some man is dead," said Philip. "How strange—at midnight.

Then he counted the strokes that denote the age. He counted to 100.

"One hundred?" exclaimed Philip. "How extraordinary. How can that be?"
"Philip." said Salome, laugh ing, "do you not know? It is the Devil's Kneil."
"The Devil's Kneil."
"Yes, at midnight on Christm has Eve, the sexton here and in other Yorkshir e towns tolls the kneil. The Devil is dead. Christ is born."

After a moment's thought, Philip said gravely, "Yes—the Devil is dead, that is to say, the old evil principle in me—my former self-assurance, pride and mistrust—it is dead. But, Salome, I ought to tell you that there was a time, and not so long ago when a I—"
She put her hand over his m puth.
"The Devil is dead," she said; "I want to hear nothing of his last sickness. But, Philip, you ought to know that I was—at Andermatt—very foolish, very jeal—"
He stopped her with a kiss.
"Salome, you were never foolish; you were always an angel."
"Well," she said, "we will not talk of the past; we will set our faces to-the future. The Devil is dead."

FEATURES OF TRADE.

Produce Situation Viewed by a Liberty Street Merchant.

Prospects Are Good for Tanners---Stock Well Cleaned Up.

PROVISIONS CLOSE--TRADE ACTIVE OFFICE OF PITTSBURG DISPATCH, SATURDAY, July 27, 1889,

In most trade lines the evidences of midsummer's usual dullness are marked. Country produce moved freely in the fore part of the week, but for a couple of days past has been quiet. One of our Liberty street commission men, who has been rusticating in Washington and Beaver counties for a week or two past, gives as the result of his observations the following as his view of the situation: "The fruit crop this sesson is below the average through the territory which looks upon Pittsburg as its trade center. Last season it was much above the average. Peaches and early apples are almost a failure. Pears and plums will not do much better. The best and plums will not do much better. The best advices I can get are to the effect that we are to have a short apple crop throughout the country this season.

"On the other hand, everything in the line of vegetables and field crops promises to be unusually plenty in this section. Wheat has already been safely gathered in larger quantity than for many years past. Hay and oats are nothing behind in the yield, and while corn had a slow and unpromising start in the spring, it is fast making up for lost time through the influence of sunshine and timely showers, and all signs now point to a season of plenty in the line of substantials. Potatoes promise a larger yield than I have ever known. They are so thick in the ground that they are pushing the vines out.

vines out,
"My observation leads me to the conclusion that we are to have one of the most prolific sensons on record in the lines most needed by

The market shows no new features the past week. Said a leading dealer in bides: "There is no snap in our business, as there used to be, but tanners are working up as much stock as but tanners are working up as much stock as ever and we are buying and selling our usual quantity. Local demand holds up better than that from distant points. We sell a great deal to New England, and the trade there has not been up to standard of late. Our home tanners are putting the full quantity of raw material into vats. Local demand for upper and calf skins has improved in the past week. Tallow has taken an upward turn and is one-fourth cent better than last week. The movement of tallow has been better for a few days past than for a couple of months."

A representative of one of our largest Alleghony tanneries reports improved demand for harness leather since the 1st of July. Tanners are sold up close to production, and while there are sold up close to production, and while there is no advance in prices and margins are close the goods are moving out freely. The demand for red sole leather is also reported good. Prospects are good for an active fall trade in leather lines, and a little stiffening up of prices would bring a bonanza to our tanners, as they never had better opportunities to secure stock at low prices than for the past year."

Horse Equipments.

A leading dealer in this line reports June and July trade fully up to the corresponding months of last year. Said he: "We do not have dull seasons in our line as we used to have. In former years, the three summer have. In former years, the three summer months were our slack months, but of late years trade runs uniformly the year through. The first month of this year was the best month we ever had in our line, and trade has held up remarkably well. We have no doubt that our volume of trade for 1889 will pass that of 1888, with prices very much the same. The drop on harness leather since last year, makes no difference on price of a first-class set of harness."

Provisions. Prices are down to bedrock, but goods are moving freely. The volume of trade this week was fully up to last. A representative of one our leading porkpacking firms said to-day: "We are as busy Lehigh Valley.

There was a dearth of new features in local business affairs last week, but the volume of trade was large for the season, of an unusually large fall movement continue to multiply. The failures in Phila-delphia and Richmond had no perceptible effect here. Local securities were fairly active and strong, La Noria and Philadelphia Gas leading, the former with sales on 'Change of 3,250 shares and the latter of 2,767. The total sales of stocks during the week were 7,000, not counting office and street transactions. Realty was rather quiet street transactions. Realty was rather quiet in respect of sales, but the inquiry, principally for small houses and building lots, was large and carnest. The number of deeds recorded was 230, involving $406,472. The business in mortgages showed an improvement over that of the previous week, the number placed and settled being 179, representing $359,036. The largest was for $40,000. Sag in the Wheat Pit Allays Fears of a July Squeeze-New York Exports a Factor on the Bull Side.

CHICAGO—The weather was hot and muggy here to-day, and during most of the session the usual Saturday's quietness prevailed in the wheat pit. Trade was enlivened by the filling of some New York buying orders and possibly some for foreign account, but local sentiment was not sufficiently pronounced in favor of either the built or the bear side of wheat to of either the bull or the bear side of wheat to create any enthusiasm or competitive bidding. Upon the whole the feeling was one of weak-ness all the morning, and early trading was at prices fractionally below yesterday's closing range.

Apprehensions of a squeeze in July property were still further allayed by a sag in the price from 80½c at the opening to 79½c, and although a rally to about the opening price quickly followed this break, it is not believed that enough of a short interest exists in July to be worth mentioning. New export business in New York was variously estimated at from 15 to 22 boatloads, and the news caused the market here to firm up ½c or so, but there was a dragging trade during the last half of the session and ging trade during the last half of the session and December hung stubbornly around 79%@79%c. Corn ruled quiet the greater part of the session, with occasional periods of temporary activity. The market opened a shade under the closing prices of yesterday, was steady for a time, eased off a little, recovered, remained inactive and closed nearly the same as yesterday.

Inactive and closed nearly the same as yesterday.

Outs were quiet and steady, the market being in the same condition as for several days past. A comparatively light business was reported in mess pork and brices ruled a regular within a narrow range. The feeling was easy early and prices ruled 10c lower, but moderate buying later in the day railied prices 73/200c. Near the close the market was weak and prices receded 122/205c and closed quiet.

A quiet and doil feeling prevailed in the lard market and the feeling easy. Prices ruled 23/205c lower and the market closed quiet.

Trading was moderate in the market for short ribs. Prices ruled irregular within a amall range and closed quiet at inside figures.
